

A NASTURTIIUM for PATRIOTISM

Native to South American countries, the nasturtium was first found growing in Mexico and Peru where it was used to flavor foods. It was brought to Europe in the 16th century by the Spaniards and considered a symbol of conquest and victory in battle. It became a symbol of power and is found in abundance in French royal gardens. It was also a feature on a United States president's home, Thomas Jefferson's Monticello. The symbolism behind nasturtiums could also be connected to its shocking color of orange color as well as the way the shape of the foliage resembles a shield. Soldiers used to wear nasturtiums as a sign of victory. Let's start wearing them now! As a gift, these blossoms are often given to represent the end of a struggle, or as encouragement during a long journey. We have a long row to hoe, so please accept this nasturtium as encouragement for the journey ahead. Wear it proudly.
